

Speaking with The Guardian newspaper while promoting Real Steel, Hugh Jackman - perhaps best known for his role as Wolverine in the X-Men films - says The Wolverine will be much simpler than 2009's X-Men Origins: Wolverine, saying that it won't have as many characters (he believes that the main flaw was that it had too many characters). He also reveals that the film goes more into the character, and that they have the chance to 'nail the character', which Jackman believes hasn't been done yet. "I think we've got the chance to nail the character this time, to do the hole-in-one. We haven't managed that yet. On the last movie, we complicated it with too many other characters. And there'll be more women this time, which is good. The last one was so masculine! "The new film will go more into the character. I don't think we've ever seen his rage

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/BatFreak/news/?a=47777&t=Hugh_Jackman_Says_The_Wolverine_Will_Be_Filled_With_Rage_Will_Have_Less_Focus_On_Other_Characters