

Since news broke that Marvel Studios' 2014 Captain America sequel may be followed by a big-screen adaptation of The Black Panther, potential T'Challa contenders have been modestly campaigning for the King of Wakanda. Via Examiner, the latest is actor Aldis Hodge. When asked if he favored a comic book series, Hodge replied: "Growing up I was a fan of Black Panther and X-Men comic books. I was also a huge Batman fan. There's recently been a little buzz online about Marvel pushing for Black Panther, and I've been in love with the idea for years. I want the fans to know that the one role I really want to play is Black Panther. I grew up loving the Marvel world, and grew up on martial arts. I still train. When Black Panther came around, he was almost like an African American Batman." Aldis Hodge, 25, is best known for his Alec

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/MarvelFreshman/news/?a=62228>