

Despite the fact that the DC Films Universe is separate to the DC TV Universe, we've known for a while now that Warner Bros. has a say in which characters are and aren't allowed to receive the spotlight on the small screen. As a result, the fact that Henry Cavill is flying around as Superman in the movies made it quite the surprise when Tyler Hoechlin was added to Supergirl season two as the Man of Steel. Unfortunately, it's looking like his two appearances in The CW series will be it for a while as that's all the show's producers could get out of Warner Bros. (likely because they realised it would help with ratings after Supergirl's move from CBS, and it most definitely did). Here's what executive producer Andrew Kreisberg told Kryptonsite during a recent Q&A when they asked about Superman's future. "We're so happy with what we get to do. I don't mean for that to sound as bad as it does,
