

Superhero films have taken a massive stride in the last decade, and their popularity continues to be at an all time high, accompanied with massive pressure to deliver a great story that does each and every character justice. Ben Affleck has been on the receiving end of this pressure lately; ever since the actor confirmed that he would be writing, directing, and starring in the next Batman film, the media has done nothing but quiz Affleck for details in every interview, regardless of the context. Unfortunately, communication continued to unravel as time went on; representatives from Warner Bros. and other actors involved with the project said quite confidently that production would begin on the film this spring, while Affleck maintained in every interview that the script was not complete and that the film would be made when he was ready. The actor went so far as to state that he would not make the film unless it came together how he wanted, something he

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/batman/ben-affleck-embraces-the-pressure-and-attention-that-comes-with-directing-a148131>