

Speaking with Screen Rant at San Diego Comic-Con last weekend, actor Charlie Hunnam (Sons Of Anarchy) talked about Pacific Rim, the upcoming science fiction epic directed by Guillermo del Toro. In the film, Hunnam's character, Raleigh Antrobus, and Rinko Kikuchi's character, Mako Mori, "use a "neural bridge" to link their minds in order to co-pilot an old model robot that could turn out to be humanity's greatest hope." Hunnam describes the basic story of the film as a classic love story, but with a sci-fi twist. "Well, there's this whole imminent apocalypse that really distracts from a lot of the psychological stuff going on between them, but it's really more of a process of both of us opening up our hearts again enough to be able to trust somebody; it's a love story without a love story. It's about all of the necessary elements of love without arriving at love itself:

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/BatFreak/news/?a=64102>