

Talking to Empire Magazine, Christian Bale has commented on what it was like to bring the Caped Crusader out of the shadows and into the light in The Dark Knight Rises. "It was very strange to start with. We had the idea of intimidation and the mystery being successful in the dark. And so it did feel odd to be outside quite so much. But obviously I got used to that. We kinda mad a deal right when we first made Batman Begins; me and Chris said, 'Let's just not let people see Batman half-dressed. It's just not a good idea.' Batman should be Batman and that's it. He should always be defined and complete and let's not ruin that experience for people." "With a crowd that big you can't really control it completely," he said when talk turned to the epic battle which sees Batman and the GCPD facing off against
