

The Badass Digest have posted a description, and reaction to, the 10 minutes of footage from The Hobbit: An Unexpected Journey they saw at CinemaCon today. This marked the first time anyone has seen footage filmed at 48fps. This is the new projection standard (previously 24fps) that the likes of Peter Jackson and James Cameron have been touting as "the next big thing". But first reactions to this have been mixed. In fact, I haven't read reports from anyone who thought it came across entirely successful, and the majority seemed to feel it was very disappointing - giving off a very "tv" vibe. Devin Farcai from Badass Digest definitely wasn't a fan (a few positives aside), and you can read why by clicking the link below. But more interesting was his description of the footage that screened.. There was a lot of the helicopter shots you expect in a Lord of the

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/rorschachsrrants/news/?a=58512>