

Back in 2008, JJ Abrams, Matt Reeves and writer Drew Goddard made waves in Hollywood and theaters with their film Cloverfield, which gave movie goers a new, fresh take on the monster/alien invasion film. Using the now popular "found footage" filming style, it offered viewers a chance to view an invasion of a giant creature through the eyes of first-hand witnesses. Aside from making numerous patrons sick, it started a small trend in the movie biz, with films like this year's hit Chronicle following suit. Ever since then, a sequel has been discussed, but no real action has been taken by Paramount or the trio responsible for the first film. There were rumors at one time of a potential plot for the potential second film, which used the same style of filming, only following a different group of friends as the main focus. The tie-in to the first film would be

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/geekboymovienews/news/?a=55935>