

The Power Rangers reboot is swiftly approaching, but Lionsgate doesn't seem to be the least bit fazed as outside of the initial trailer, they've hardly released anything official from the highly anticipated Dean Israelite-directed movie. Instead of debuting fresh stills or footage over the past few weeks, we've instead (somewhat oddly) been treated to merchandise images, which have revealed the Dinozords, the Megazord, Alpha 5, Goldar, and the Putty Patrollers. However, it looks like our luck might just be on the verge of turning around as the latest "leaked" photo seems to be from the actual movie and could be one of the most accurate things we've seen from the film to date. The photo in question, which originated on Reddit, seemingly reveals our first look at Primetime Emmy-winner Bryan Cranston (Breaking Bad) as the Rangers' wise mentor/guardian Zordon overseeing what is presumably the Command Center and just like his television counterpart, he's once again a giant floating head. Alpha 5 also features in
