

The CW is looking for its next big superhero hit with Smallville wrapping earlier this year. According to Deadline The CW is turning to Deadman to try and fill the void that Smallville has left behind. Supernatural creator Eric Kripke will serve as writer and executive producer on the show. Deadman was created by Arnold Drake and Carmine Infantino. Reports Deadline: With Smallville ending its 10-season run this past May, the CW has made launching a new superhero franchise based on a DC property a priority. The network's first effort this development season is Deadman, a drama based on the DC Comics books by Arnold Drake and Carmine Infantino, which will be written and executive produced by Supernatural creator Eric Kripke. For those not familiar with the character Deadman is Boston Brand a circus trapeze artist who is murdered during a trapeze act and is given the power to inhabit other peoples body's

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/JakeLester/news/?a=45200&t=iDeadmani_Getting_His_Own_Television_Show