

Marvel vs. DC has become quite the hot topic this year with all the big movies coming to theaters. It's quite the hot topic on this site in particular. Yet, as I read the comments, articles, and opinions of all of these life-long comic fans, I can't help but ask myself.... WHY? I myself am a die hard DC comics fan (check out my editorial on batman here: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fan_fic/news/?a=62630). Always have been, always will be. I have never owned a marvel comic in my life. I think the characters are fantastic... I just have never personally been that invested in them. But does that mean I don't respect and appreciate all they have done for the comic book universe? Of course not. I can completely understand the need to feel like you need to defend your stance on which you think
