

"How do you feel about the current state of comic book films?" This question is being tackled by 100 individuals, ranging from comic professionals to media personalities and even fellow fans, in the CBM 100. Each person is given 100 words or less to provide their own take on the matter, whether through straight analysis, quick anecdotes or incessant rambling. These perspectives will serve to present comic book films in several lights and stimulate discussion on the matter. Today's comment comes from comic artist, writer, editor and film professional Bob Layton. Layton has had a hand in flagship comic properties for both Marvel and DC, as well as a celebrated role in the universe of Valiant Comics and his own publishing company, Future Comics. He has co-penned such famous tales as the Iron Man arcs "Armor Wars" and "Demon in a Bottle," and then recently returned to the character in 2008
