

Logan will be the end of an era for those who have stuck with Twentieth Century Fox's X-Men franchise. The film will see the end of Hugh Jackman's 17 year run as Wolverine, which is a long time to play any role, much less a comic book character. While Jackman may have seemed odd for the part at first, his passion for the character and willingness to throw his all into the role has left many fans hard-pressed to see anyone else taking on the character in the future. In a recent interview with Entertainment Tonight, Jackman made it clear that none of his passion went away when making the final film. "There is not a frame of this film where I can't say I didn't put everything into it," Jackman said. "I couldn't have made this film if I didn't make the decision within myself that this was the last one. I just didn't compromise on anything. I was a pain to a

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/x-men/logan/hugh-jackman-and-patrick-stewart-discuss-logan-saying-goodbye-and-the-a148982>