

Superheroes can cause a fair bit of collateral damage. With all of those super powers, you know somebody is going to have a misplaced energy blast or stray punch that ends up leveling an entire city block sooner or later. However, there are some heroes (and villains) that make the environment their main priority. Events do not have to be as dramatic as explosions and wanton destruction to cause harm to our landscape, because as we all know it is the events one rarely sees coming that cause the most destruction! If Doctor Doom was blasting a hole into the Ozone layer with a giant laser we might be able to react a bit more proactive than the slow decay caused by CFCs and a little bit too much hairspray. So on this fine Earth Day of 2011, we should tip our hats to the characters that champion the cause of the
