

"I guess there's the tradition of the theatre where everybody would do their version of Hamlet and everybody would do their King Lear and that kind of thing," the actor who played Harry Osborn in Sam Raimi's Spider-Man trilogy said when asked to share his thoughts on the upcoming reboot. "It's a little different with movies because people like to think that films last forever, but within just 10 years you already have a new Spider-Man franchise. It's weird what that might do to the original Spider-Man films... I had a great time on the Spider-Man films and Tobey, Kirsten [Dunst] and Sam Raimi have all become lifelong friends." "My role in those films was not my favourite but I'm okay with the new one," he added. "The thing is, the technology is advancing so fast that often the new renditions sell themselves as having the cutting-edge technology. What early versions couldn't do

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/joshw24/news/?a=43612&t=James_Franco_Finally_Shares_His_Thoughts_On_iThe_Amazing_Spider-Man