

Talking on The Radio Dan Show today (transcribed by our friends over at Collider), The A-Team's Joe Carnahan has talked more about his plans for a Daredevil movie with 20th Century Fox. However, as the studio failed to reach an agreement with Marvel Studios, the rights will now revert to them, making it unlikely that we'll ever see the director's unique take on the character. Fox execs were apparently keen to move ahead with his take on The Man Without Fear, but there simply wasn't enough time to make it happen before the October deadline. Below, he discusses why there just wasn't enough time to bring his version of Daredevil to the big screen. "I was brought in pretty late in the game, and my take probably didn't help matters since they had an existing script. But I just thought that if you were going to do it, this was the

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/JoshWildingNewsAndReviews/news/?a=65759>