

In a new interview with The Playlist, Director José Padilha talks a little bit more about Robocop: I never approached ['RoboCop'] by looking at the first one, and asking myself what do I keep and what do I take away. I just looked at the concept of 'RoboCop,' and the concept of 'RoboCop' is very, very interesting. RoboCop is not a superhero – he is not a superhero. He is a man that's turned into something else, by technology, and by a certain political perspective that's being criticized in Verhoeven's film, and by the media, too. So that idea, of a man that's turned into something else for some purpose, appeals to me on its own regardless of the first film. He said when he was asked about how his vision of the film will be. I had a take on it, which I can't tell you what it is because it would ruin
