

Apparently talking with the press, via PhilSTAR, the writer and director of this summer's long-awaited superhero spectacle Marvel's The Avengers, Joss Whedon, discussed his visual style for the movie among other things. Additionally weighing on meeting fans' expectation, and his overall direction, check out what he says below! "As much as anything, my visual style as a director comes from comic books," he says. "My understanding of visual storytelling comes from panel art, which I was reading more voraciously than I was watching movies for most of my childhood. In that sense, I had sort of a head start when I started visualizing this film. I hired Seamus McGarvey to be my Director of Photography because of 'Atonement.' It's a gorgeous film. Seamus' understanding of light as romantic and naturalistic is dazzling. "Visually, the movie is similar to a lot of things that I do because it's supposed to be casually

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/MarvelFreshman/news/?a=55921>