

In 2003 Joss Whedon had signed on to write and direct a live-action film for Wonder Woman. Warner Bros. of course didn't see eye-to-eye with Whedon's vision, which centered around the Amazonian Princess learning about humanity from an outsider's perspective. I'm assuming after The Avengers smashed box office records left and right that WB is kicking themselves for letting Whedon's talents go elsewhere. Since then WB teamed-up with David E. Kelley for an ill-fated Wonder Woman television series, and even more recently CW has expressed interest in making their own television series for Diana Prince. They're still trying to do Wonder Woman. Even David E. Kelley couldn't get it aired on TV. Why don't they know how to do that character? I don't think that was a match. I just don't. I don't think that he needs to write about superheroes. You need to need to write about superheroes to write about superheroes.

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/nailbiter111/news/?a=67171>