

Knee-deep in post-production on one of next summer's most highly-anticipated films, Marvel's The Avengers, director Joss Whedon recently discussed his vision for another comic book movie adaptation; one that he was signed on to write and direct for Warner Bros. in 2003. Essentially reiterating his big-screen treatment for Wonder Woman, read on below. He told Rookie that his Diana was "a little bit like Angelina Jolie. She sort of traveled the world. She was very powerful and very naïve about people, and the fact that she was a goddess was how I eventually found my in to her humanity and vulnerability," he says. "She would look at us and the way we kill each other and the way we let people starve and the way the world is run and she'd just be like, 'None of this makes sense to me. I can't cope with it, I can't understand, people are insane.'" "Ultimately her

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/MarvelFreshman/news/?a=49518&t=Joss_Whedon_Once_Again_Explains_His_Vision_For_A_Wonder_Woman_Movie