

Collider recently had the pleasure of interviewing the director of Men in Black 3, Barry Sonnenfeld. One of the topics that came up in the discussion was which celebrities will pop up on the alien surveillance screen. In the previous two films this gimmick has produced some hearty laughs, and Barry hopes to strike comedy gold once again. Sonnenfeld: Well, we've always had in Men in Black headquarters, alien surveillance, so one of the joys is deciding who you would put up on the board, who you would tell the world are aliens. And A) the challenge is you have to get permission from these celebrities and B) you don't want to go with people that are either a flash in the pan, or political, or people that then in 10 years no one will know who you're talking about. In fact, in Addams Family Values, which I directed, there is a

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/nailbiter111/news/?a=58150>