

Earlier today, I reviewed Marvel Anime's new "Iron Man" series, which airs at 11:00 Eastern on G4TV. For those who might be interested in what I thought of Marvel Anime's take on the Armored Avenger, that review can be found here. I had originally intended to post this review simultaneously, but as I began, I found that I needed more time to ruminate and decide what I REALLY thought. My conclusions are as follows: The prospect of a Wolverine anime did not fill me with as much trepidation as the Iron Man one did for one very good reason: Wolverine has long had an association with Japan, going back to the Chris Claremont/Frank Miller mini-series of the early eighties. I knew there was some meat on that bone, and I was anxious to see how that was interpreted for the screen. As the show began,

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/Filmthoughts/news/?a=43296&t=Kerry67_Reviews_Marvels_iWolverine_Anime