

Continuing from an earlier interview with Wired, where Marvel's movie architect discussed not having the likes of Spider-Man, Wolverine and the X-Men and the Fantastic Four available to the MCU, Feige goes on to discuss their genre rival DC and the successful year that was 2008. On competition with DC and whether he roots against or for the competition to succeed----

Feige: But the truth is I root for every single one, whether it's our movies or not, because while you and I know the difference between who publishes what, I've been in supermarket checkout lines where one of our characters is on the cover of a magazine, somebody says, "Is Green Lantern in The Avengers? Is Aquaman in that one too?" People don't know. So I want them all to be great. Chris Nolan's Batman is the greatest thing that happened because it bolstered everything. Imagine the one-two punch in 2008 of Iron
