

Avengers: Infinity War is going to be a massive undertaking for Marvel Studios, especially as it's shooting back to back with the currently untitled fourth instalment. Talking in a recent interview with Collider, Kevin Feige shed some light on exactly how long it will take to film the movies and when that's actually set to begin. It's clearly going to be a very busy year for Joe and Anthony Russo anyway! "Well without being super specific cameras start rolling in January and will continue rolling in some form or another through October, November," he revealed before adding that there will be some days when Avengers: Infinity War and Avengers 4 shoot on the same day. "[It's] just for efficiency's sake—but we are treating them both on a production level and a creative level as two distinct movies." As for whether or not Avengers: Infinity War will focus just on the heroes we've met or some major new faces, he added: "It is primarily
