

The Film Journal recently caught with Marvel Studios' head and mastermind, Kevin Feige, where he essentially weighs in on the studios' game plan with Joe Johnston's Captain America: The First Avenger, Joss Whedon's The Avengers, as well Shane Black's Iron Man 3. Also sharing thoughts on films owned by other studios, ultimately The Amazing Spider-man and his involvement, check it all out below. On what makes Marvel Studios' "joint" special... "Our movies surprise people who think they're just coming to see a lot of special effects. We always look to find the balance of the epic and the intimate, whether we're focusing on a scientist on the run because his affliction turns him big and green or a billionaire weapons designer who wouldn't seem to be very relatable at all. The best compliment we can get on all of our movies is, 'You know, I don't usually like these kinds of movies, but
