

Ever since the very first X-Men film, comic book fans have been waiting in anticipation for the moment that Hugh Jackman would suit up in a comic-accurate costume as Wolverine. 17 years and eight (soon to be nine) films later, the classic yellow suit has remained unworn and pretty much unseen, appearing as the contents of a suitcase in a deleted scene from 2013's The Wolverine. While some fans are still holding out hope for some last-minute saving grace in Jackman's final film, Logan, director James Mangold recently told Screen Rant that he thinks the suit works against who Logan is as a character, and that he's convinced fans would not be happy if Jackman ever did wear it in a film. "I always feel a certain contingent of fans who are yearning for it. But the biggest block I've had – I'm willing to take the heat for it – is that, I can never get past, being a writer for these

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/x-men/logan/logan-director-james-mangold-believes-wolverines-classic-costume-a149117>