

In the 75 years of the character's existence, few have been able to tackle the role of Wonder Woman, and even fewer have had the sort of longevity that actress Lynda Carter did when she played the character in the 1970's television show. Now that the Amazonian princess is getting her own film, along with roles in Batman v Superman, Justice League, and beyond, is it possible that Carter would be open to making a cameo to pay tribute to her time in the role? According to the actress, not just yet. "I've spoken to [director] Patty Jenkins," Carter said in an interview with Variety. "She talked to me on the phone about the character, and we were trying to see if I could do something with the movie, but it didn't work out. The timing was off, and I was doing other things and couldn't get over to where they were shooting." Of course, this wouldn't rule out an appearance in a
