Talking at the Critics' Choice Awards on Friday, Damon said: "I really hope it's going to happen.... [but] it's really up to Paul Greengrass, the director. I've always said I won't do it without him and I think it would be a bad idea to do it without Paul." According to The Hollywood Reporter, last October Universal announced that it was developing another film with Michael Clayton and Gilroy at the head, but Damon was never consulted. The star continued: "I think Paul's probably going to do one or two other films that he's got kind of cooking but after that [maybe they would start working on a Bourne film].... I think it's kind of the thing where enough time has passed that I think it won't matter if we wait five more years to do it." Finally, he closed by saying: "We just want to make sure if we do it, that we do
