

In a recent interview with Collider, Lost star Matthew Fox has talked about his role in Marc Forster's World War Z; a film which has reportedly been the victim of a very trouble production (leading to numerous reshoots and a last-minute script rewrite). His latest role is as the murderous 'Picasso' in the big screen adaptation of James Patterson's Alex Cross novel, and the site was quick to ask him whether there are any similarities between the psychopathic serial killer and his character in World War Z. As it turns out, there aren't any! No, they're very different people. It was just one of those scheduling things that was unfortunate because I was trying to make myself look a certain way for this role, and then I would have, given the opportunity, [made the character] look a little bit different in World War Z. But, he's a Navy seal
