

Michael Keaton will forever be etched in the memories of millions of fans worldwide as the original film Batman, having starred as the Caped Crusader in 1989's Batman and then again in its 1992 sequel Batman Returns, but this summer he's primed to leave behind a whole new kind of legacy, this time a much more menacing one. The Academy Award-nominated actor will of course star as Adrian Toomes a.k.a. The Vulture in Marvel's Spider-Man: Homecoming, which will be the beloved wall-crawler's official entry into the Marvel Cinematic Universe, following his debut in the 2016 blockbuster Captain America: Civil War. Keaton will star opposite up-and-comer Tom Holland (The Impossible), who is headlining the Jon Watts-directed film as everyone's favorite friendly neighborhood web-slinger. Academy Award-winner Marisa Tomei (The Wrestler) and 2x Academy Award-nominee Robert Downey Jr. (Iron Man) will also feature in key roles. In a recent profile on Variety, Keaton, who is currently on the press tour for his latest release The Founder, spoke at

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/spider-man/michael-keaton-details-the-interesting-challenge-it-was-to-play-the-a148109>