

Over the past week we've seen several clips from Marc Webb's The Amazing Spider-Man, and I don't think it's a surprise that none of them feature even a sniff of The Lizard. After multiple viewings of the second trailer and glancing over promotional art like the one below, when it comes to The Lizard you can color me not impressed. I expected the look to improve, but now that seems like wishful thinking at best. And it's a shame because from what I've seen it appears as though the look of the main villain is the only thing they dropped the ball on. Even Spidey's basketball-textured suit is starting to grow on me. Could the movie still succeed even if the villain looks like a CGI mess?
