

In yesterday's story, Rogue One editors John Gilroy and Colin Goudie revealed that many of the reshoots for the Star Wars prequel were done to provide their characters with additional introductory backgrounds. When asked about the drastic changes to the third act of the film, however, Gilroy dodged the question. "I don't want to go into too much detail about what had been there before, but it was different." It's been deduced through behind-the-scenes shots and excised trailer scenes that Jyn Erso, Cassian Andor, K-2SO and Orson Krennic were all originally intended to make it down to the battle-torn beaches of Scarif, with the heroes carrying the physical plans for the Death Star with them. How and why events played out this way has yet to be discovered, but a few new photos (courtesy of /Film) have given us a look at some scenes that never made the final cut. One photo of Jyn and Cassian stands out in particular; the two Rebels
