

We go our first look at The Vulture during this year's San Diego Comic-Con, but it appears as if that won't be the only costume the villain wears in the movie. We've seen him in a pretty advanced battle suit, but here he's covering that with a pair of green pants and a jacket with a collar which clearly pays homage to the camp outfit worn by Adrian Toomes during his comic book battles with the wall-crawler. It seems like this artwork may be for an action figure, and it wouldn't be the first time something like this has given us an early look at a character (it's how we saw The Vision for the first time too). The fact that The Vulture is still wearing a mask here but is in a totally different costume may add some weight to theories that two different people will end up taking on the mantle here. If Spider-Man: Homecoming follows the source material, that could
