

Trailing Marvel Studios' announcement earlier today that Captain America: The Winter Soldier's principal photography will take place in Cleveland, Ohio, we've stumbled across another shooting location prearranged for the forthcoming sequel. During an interview with Reel Talk with Film DC Podcast, conducted a little over a month ago, the senior communications manager with the DC Film Office, Leslie Green, revealed that Washington, District of Columbia is on Marvel's radar for the Chris Evans-starrer. "We have the Captain America sequel that should be shooting here in the Spring of 2013," Green asserted, after being asked to name upcoming projects set to film in D.C.. "So we're very excited about Marvel and Disney coming here for that," she added. Although Marvel productions have been prone to shooting in cities that'd double for another location in the film, usually because it'd be too expensive to destroy them on-location, we have certain obvious reasons to

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/MarvelFreshman/news/?a=67957>