

When word hit that DC Comics were essentially rebooting their entire line of titles and starting from scratch with all new #1 issues the reaction was decidedly mixed. Many felt that to completely disregard so many great titles, including the longest running comic there was in Detective Comics, was nothing more than a cynical ploy to market the characters to a younger, "hipper" demographic. Of course, that WAS one of DC's goals but didn't mean we weren't going to get some great comics at the same time. We are just about to hit the third week of DC's new 52 releases and have seen about half of the titles on the shelves. From the most anticipated comics like Action Comics and Green Lantern to more obscure cult characters like Animal Man and Swamp Thing which have actually garnered the highest praise so far. Judging from your feedback on previous articles I think
