

Warner Bros. has stuck pretty much solely to Batman and Justice League related animated features in recent years, but it seems as if the success of Batman: The Killing Joke and the recently released Batman: Return of the Caped Crusaders may have opened the door to some slightly riskier ventures from the studio. That's according to WGTC as they're reporting that moviegoers who paid to see the studio's latest animated release earlier this week were handed a very interesting survey. On that, they were presented with a list of possible upcoming releases and asked how interested they would be in each of them. That's clearly a way of gauging interest in the movies by Warner Bros. Among those mentioned were a Batman/Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles crossover, a Wonder Woman '77 movie (presumably with Lynda Carter voicing the titular hero), and Swamp-Thing, a character who will soon get the spotlight in the Justice League Dark animated feature. That's an interesting mixture, and while there's nothing to

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/batman/possible-upcoming-dc-animated-movies-include-batman-tmnt-crossover-and-a145946>