

Reinvention or reimagine...Those are the two words that are very popular in Hollywood right now. Whether if it is reinvention of the single character or the entire film, sometimes it works, especially when you have the original director back for a brand new version of the film. In this case, that is Ridley Scott, who directed a sci-fi film noir Blade Runner from 1982. Starring Harrison Ford as Rick Deckard and Rutger Hauer as replicant (genetically engineered organic robots) Roy Batty, film was set in a dystopian Los Angeles in 2019. By many, this is one of the best films in its genre. Today, the news broke that Scott is confirmed to direct another film, but it's still unclear what will it be, a sequel, prequel or something else. Well, talking to LA Times' 24 Frames, producer Andrew Kosove offered some new info, and why it was necessary to get Ridley

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/Wolvie09/news/?a=44687&t=Producer Andrew Kosove Comments On New iBlade Runneri Film Harrison Ford Wont Return