

Source: New York Times via Bleeding Cool Here's an excerpt from the article: Red Voltage and two of his masked crime-fighting colleagues were approaching an intersection here in Utah's capital on a recent evening, walking night patrol on foot, when a car suddenly slowed next to them. The night was bitterly cold, laced with a wispy stew of fog that might or might not conceal a thousand dangers. The car's window rolled down. "Hi, superheroes!" a woman shouted from within. "I'm in love with you guys!" Eat your heart out, Batman. In a niche of urban life that has evolved in recent years somewhere between comic-book fantasy and the Boy Scout oath, a cadre of self-cast crusaders — some with capes, some without, all with something to prove — are on the march. Check out the video below and be sure to click the link underneath the banner to read the full article. Follow @MarkJulianCBM !function(d,s,id){var

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/GraphicCity/news/?a=51885&t=Real_Life_Superheroes_Grace_The_Cover_Of_The_New_York_Times