

Not long ago, I posted an editorial that asked "How Young is Too Young to Read Comics?" With the youth of the world being bombarded by influences these days, whether it be television, films, school or even comic books, I think it's important for parents to play a part in that influence, even if it's on a small scale. So, in the article mentioned above, I asked at what age you did or would allow your kids to tackle comic books. Not unexpectedly, the majority of the voters would leave it up to the kids to make that decision, with most of those also stating that they would want to approve of the material first. Like I insuated in the article, you wouldn't let your 8 year-old head off to an R-Rated movie without at least viewing it for yourself (usually), so the same could be said with comic books. From there,
