

Starting with Justice League #1, DC Comics rebooted their convoluted (and arguably confusing) continuity this time last year with 52 new #1 issues. Some titles featured characters who hadn't been featured prominently in their own books for quite some time (Animal Man, Swamp-Thing), others wiped untold amounts of stories from history (Supergirl), and a few even offered an entirely new perspective on iconic heroes (Aquaman). A few titles actually remained pretty much the same (Green Lantern) or just had impressive creative team shake-ups (Batman). The question we asked you was whether or not you guys consider it to have been a success. Well, below are the results in full, and as you can see, it appears that the majority of you have been pleased with the direction of "The New 52" so far. Should Marvel follow in their footsteps?
