

Talking to Collider, Ridley Scott has offered up a description of a full scene from his upcoming Blade Runner sequel. While he doesn't go into too much detail, the director has offered fans an idea of what to expect from the film when it comes to its visual style. Known for creating some truly breathtaking images up on the big screen, it comes as no surprise that Scott is already giving the look of the sequel a great deal of thought. Check out the video below and sound off with your thoughts in the usual place. "There'll be a vast farmland where there are no hedges or anything in sight, and it's flat like the plains of—where's the Great Plains in America? Kansas, where you can see for miles. And it's dirt, but it's being raked. On the horizon is a combine harvester which is futuristic with klieg lights, 'cause

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/JoshWildingNewsAndReviews/news/?a=60997>