

Last night's episode of Game Of Thrones has to have been the most highly anticipated so far, as fans of the books knew what to expect and even those who hadn't read them couldn't have missed the great promotional work from HBO during the build up. War is indeed here, but did this fiery battle live up to expectations? The answer is yes, and then some. For the first - and most likely only - time the narrative stays focused on only one location and group of characters. No seeing how Jon Snow fares with the Wildlings this week, it's all Kings Landing, all fire, all blood. We begin with the various Kings Landing characters preparing for Stannis Baratheon's invasion in their own unique ways. Tyrion seems to have accepted that he's going to have to step up and use some of his trademark smarts if he is to protect the city
