

If you have seen either of director Tarsem Singh's (or just Tarsem, depending on his mood I guess!) movies then you will have a fair idea what to expect from Immortals. Both The Cell and The Fall are visually astounding, but while the former was also pretty dire in every other respect, The Fall is actually one of my favorite movies. I was equally as impressed with the story and performances in that as I was with the eye candy on display. Tarsem's third film falls somewhere between the two. Immortals tells the story of King Hyperion's (Mickey Rourke) quest for the fabled Emperius bow which will give him the power to release the Titans and end the reign of the Gods led by Zeus (Luke Evans). At least, that is what we are told initially. Somehow as the movie progresses that becomes a quest to end humanity while he is at
