

I'll start by putting those ridiculous Twilight comparisons to rest. Literally the only thing both of these franchises have in common is that they are based on a series of novels, and focus on younger protagonists. That's it. You can argue that both also have a love triangle at their center but that's really doing The Hunger Games a disservice. There are hints of it, but it's much more complex than the pining, forced "they fancy each other cos we said they do" rubbish from Twilight, nor is it the focal point of the story. But putting aside any story comparisons, The Hunger Games differs from Twilight in one very crucial way - it's a good movie. The story takes place in a future that has been devastated by revolution leading to war. When society finally built itself back up, the ruling class set up 12 districts populated by the lower

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/rorschachsrants/news/?a=56803>