

Earlier today, Sony Pictures showed off a snippet of the Spider-Man: Homecoming trailer at Brazil's CCXP, and descriptions are already flooding online. The clearest comes from Marvel's own Agent M, and as you can see below, the wall-crawler is about to get a major costume upgrade as he's given a new suit by Jon Favreau's Happy Hogan. Some claim that it bears a resemblance to the Iron Spider costume from the Civil War comic book, but a detailed breakdown of the suit has yet to be revealed. "The Spider-Man Homecoming footage was short but AWESOME," he explains via Twitter. "Starts from Spidey's POV, talking with Happy Hogan. There's a case from Tony Stark with an "upgrade" for Spidey. Then we see Spidey leap off a building, open his arms, web wings! There were a few more flashes of shots, but I can't remember. That classic underarm webbing look was just so rad." Apparently, those web wings are fairly large and Spider-Man actually jumps off the

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/spider-man/spider-man-homecoming-clip-description-confirms-major-costume-change-a147239>