

Thanks to TrekMovie via ComingSoon.net we have a few little snippets of information regarding the current status of the production, as well revealing a few details about a 'jungle planet' set and 'famous Star Trek location' being used as part of the production. On when filming starts TrekMovie has learned from trusted sources that the official start date for production on the Star Trek sequel is January 15th, 2012. This is over four years and two months after the start of production for the 2009 Star Trek movie (which began shooting on November 7th, 2007). On the pre-production status Much of the design work for the film has been completed, with the team again headed by Scott Chambliss as production designer. And construction has already started for some of the new sets. Many sets and location set dressing elements from the 2009 film (such as the USS Enterprise) have been in storage and will
