

When the first details about Arrow's fourth season were revealed at last year's Comic-Con, things looked good for The CW series. Oliver Queen would finally be known as the Green Arrow and had a new costume, while Starling City was transformed into Star City. Throw in big bad Damien Darhk, and fans were excited, but season four ultimately ended up being a disappointment to fans and critics. It turns out that Stephen Amell also wasn't particularly happy about the way things played out as he's told Entertainment Weekly that it quickly became clear to him changes had to be made by the time season five rolled around. "There's a lull in any relationship, where you have a come-to-Jesus moment, and that happened to me in Season 4," he explained. "We are a street-level crime-fighting show. We're at our best when we're focused on those things." So, those rather than romance then? The actor didn't elaborate, but admitted that if things don't change moving
