

At a time when Americans need heroes the most, it wasn't you everyday superman who showed up to save the day--A Cop or Firefighter. No, it was none other than Superman himself. Former Superman Returns star Brandon Routh took time out of his schedule to help out his hometown with relief efforts. The 31 year old also gave his hometown of Norwalk, Iowa, help in another way. No, he didn't use his super-strength, super-speed or heat vision. The actor used his voice and 'star-power' to call out for help and asked people to come volunteer and help people in need. "It's a neat thing. I think we need more things like this to bring our communities together," said Brandon Routh. "Not only when we have a disaster, a tornado or earthquake or something like that, should we come together. We can be doing this every weekend in communities," he said. I'm
