

I'm not sure how to describe all this, other than it's a big mess right now with Hollywood films in China. For months, Warner Bros. waited to hear from China Film Group Corporation regarding the release of the Christopher Nolan-directed final Batman film, The Dark Knight Rises. First, they said that the film won't be released, then that it might and so on. Then, it was revealed that China Film Group is planning to release two big superhero films on the same date, one being TDKR and the other one is The Amazing Spider-Man. Warner Brothers was not happy with this decision, so they tried to get a September release. Now, thanks to LA Times, it seems that it's finally official: The Dark Knight Rises will open on the same day as Marc Webb & Sony's The Amazing Spider-Man. The release date for both films is August 27th. But, there is more.
