

When we last saw Rick Grimes and company, things were not looking good for them. Of course, one survivor in particular is going to have a very bad day when The Walking Dead return to AMC on October 23rd, and following the release of that tense sneak peek, they have today announced the title of the season seven premiere along with a brief - and unrevealing - synopsis for the episode. It's going to be called, "The Day Will Come When You Won't Be." What significance does that have? Well, cast your minds back to season one and you may remember that as being the line spoken by Dr. Edwin Jenner at the Center for Disease Control after Rick expressed his gratitude for the chance to leave the building before it exploded and live on. Clearly, the murder of one of his friends by Negan and his trusty baseball bat Lucille is going to be bad enough that Rick will regret still being

Read more: https://www.comicbookmovie.com/the_walking_dead/the-walking-dead-season-7-premiere-title-and-synopsis-features-a145874